

FRIEZE NO.9 CORK STREET, LONDON | OCT 7 - OCT 23, 2021

Christopher Myers I Dare Not Appear

For the inaugural edition of Frieze No.9 Cork Street, James Cohan is pleased to present I Dare Not Appear, a solo exhibition of new work by Christopher Myers. The exhibition will be on view from October 7 through October 23, 2021.

I Dare Not Appear brings together new applique textile works with a collection of historical letters written by Sarah Forbes Bonetta, a young Egbado girl who lived in Victorian England. Seven of Forbes Bonetta's letters from the collection of the artist's family will be exhibited for the first time, an intimate counterpoint to the large-scale tapestries created by Myers.

In 1850, Captain Frederick E. Forbes of the Royal Navy, was bequeathed a little girl by King Ghezo of Dahomey. The gift of the "perfect genius" of an "amiable" child was intended for Queen Victoria, as a sort of tribute between royals. Raised as the Queen's goddaughter, at the interstices of global imaginaries of race, class, and colonialism, her life serves as apt illustration of the conceptual knots of Victorian England: an era characterized by a mindset that could simultaneously trample the world in colonial endeavor and see itself as civilizing souls like Sarah Forbes Bonetta.

The artist holds Forbes Bonetta's hand-written letters and associated documents, which his family purchased from a London antique shop in the late 1990s. They form part of a collection started by his father, renowned children's book author Walter Dean Myers, who based a book on these historical materials. The letters range from the emotional to the quotidian and represent a teenage girl's perspective of living in between worlds, trying to navigate the needle-eyes of courtly life, Victorian class structures, race and culture.

For Myers, his relationship to Forbes Bonetta is interwoven with his own biography and rooted in his family's stewardship of these and other archives. His tapestries delve into this personally-charged past to build visual narratives about the life of Sarah Forbes Bonnetta that speak to the slippages between history and mythology. Collectively, they exemplify the artist's deft hand in translating histories gleaned through careful research into evocative material form. He writes:

"I am interested in the ways in which the presence of Blacks in the West is always, periodicized, constructed as a curiosity, or an innovation, as if we first appeared on the Windrush in England, or on the shores of Virginia in 1619, when in fact we have been present throughout the world and in history part of longer continuity of cultural exposure and exchange."

Myers treats Forbes Bonetta's life not as an isolated curiosity of the Victorian era, but rather as a constitutive tapestry, continuous and unbroken. Her story intimately links colonial enterprise and Victorian values to the effects of living at a conceptual juncture, one that presages the diasporic anxieties and experiences of today.
